Joey Shamah didn't set out to create a social network for cosmetics enthusiasts. But after introducing a beauty blog and other community features on his cosmetics website (eyeslipsface.com) in June 2007, e-commerce sales leapt 50 percent, and the length of customer visits tripled. Shamah, 27, has a vested interest in beauty. His $20 million company, Eyes, Lips, Face Cosmetics (e.l.f. for short), sells oodles of eyeliners, lipsticks, glosses and other makeup under its brand. About half those sales are generated through the website, and many of the items go for about $1 each. NEW for Emergency Medical Services personnel! Consensus prehospital destination plans tailored to rural, suburban and urban environments. A customer orders several items from your Web site, but never receives them. After several failed attempts to contact your company, he finally gets through to you, but you have to tell him his products were never shipped, and, in fact, five of his six orders were lost completely when your online transaction system crashed during the pre-holiday rush. To top it off, no one in your customer service department even notified the customer that there was a problem with his order. This "nightmare before Christmas" became a reality last year for many e-tailers who didn't implement the proper customer service techniques on their Web sites. In fact, 46 percent of Web consumers left a preferred site due to technical problems and delayed service last holiday season, according to a post-holiday survey conducted by Jupiter Communications Inc., a New York City e-commerce research firm. The study found many of these consumers subsequently picked alternative sites on which to shop.
